Procedures and Requirements for the Undergraduate Honors Program

The Honors Program aims to be an important culminating experience for Anthropology Majors. The Honors Program in Anthropology provides eligible Anthropology majors with an opportunity to conduct original ethnographic, field, laboratory, or library-based research under the guidance of an Anthropology faculty member. As an honor's candidate, you will have the ability to conduct real research and experience what it is like to write anthropological pieces. It will also help you develop and enhance your analytical and writing skills.

Your Honors Research can be a useful demonstration of your ability for sustained research, independent work, writing skills, creation of networks and ability to generate new ideas among many others. This is particularly significant when pursuing a career in various fields.

Honors Program Components and Checklist

Proposal

Proposals should be discussed with your Honors Advisor as early as Autumn Quarter to ensure you have it finalized well before the application deadline of February 15th.

A proposal must have a good statement of: the major research problem you wish to tackle and the research questions that you have come up with to answer the research problem; the empirical and/or historical context, an overview of the academic literature on the research topic that you wish to address; and the methods and sites by which you will do ethnographic/survey/ library research; and considerations of how you will access your research sites. This is not a comprehensive list, but suggestions for content and you may choose whether to integrate these categories or treat them as separate subheadings.

Funding

Please note that this is the same deadline for various research grants offered through the department. The department holds an information session during Autumn Quarter and Winter Quarter to discuss research and grant opportunities that can be utilized for your Honors research. Students are encouraged to apply for summer research funding through the Department of Anthropology, Undergraduate Advising and Research (UAR), and various area studies centers on campus.

Advising and Support Faculty Advising

Students must meet with their Honors Advisor regularly to get advice on extra readings on their topics, submit written work for comments, and discuss the direction of their Honors research. We suggest a minimum of four meetings, at least once in the Autumn Quarter, at least twice in the Winter Quarter, and at least once in the Spring Quarter.

Your Honors Advisor must be a faculty member within the Department of Anthropology. You will also need to obtain a 2nd Reader for your research paper. The 2nd Reader must be identified and confirmed by Winter Quarter of your senior year. The Second Reader does not have to be a faculty member in the Anthropology Department.

Honors Paper

The writing portion of your research project will be supervised throughout your senior year by your Honors Faculty Advisor.

Final content of your research paper will vary according to subject and theme. It is important to discuss your main arguments and the appropriate structure of these (whether into sections or chapters) with your advisor. This discussion is part of the intellectual development of conducting your own research. An Honors Paper attempts to integrate theory, your research, and other ethnographic work by other scholars into an original piece of work. You will have to develop a distinct perspective on your material. Part of the challenge will be figuring out how to retell historical and ethnographic stories from the perspective that your research now casts.

The other major part of writing an honors paper is learning through writing and revision. The writing process is a major aspect of the learning process and distinct from conducting the original research. Your ideas will change as you write, receive feedback, do targeted readings, and then rewrite. Patience, commitment, and continuous engagement are vital.

Penultimate draft is due to your Honors advisor and second reader by the last day of Spring Quarter examination period. Your final honors paper must be submitted to your Honors Advisor and 2nd Reader on or by May 5th for review. Once final edits are made, you will then submit your Honors Paper with a completed Honors Paper Signature Sheet to the Undergraduate Student Services Officer by the published Spring Quarter course withdrawal deadline.
